ABOUT WILD THINGS:

Wild Things—an award-winning documentary produced by the Natural Resources Defense Council—examines the United States Department of Agriculture's Wildlife Services (WS) program and its devastating impacts on native carnivores. Each year, WS kills thousands of predators (including more than 75,000 coyotes) who are viewed as threats to livestock, employing inhumane methods that are poorly grounded in science—at a substantial cost to taxpayers. This approach to wildlife management is outdated, ineffective and irresponsible, and it interferes with the critical role that native carnivores play in maintaining ecosystem health.

The secretive program has long kept its brutal practices—which include the use of steel-jaw leghold traps, poisons, snares, and aerial gunning—out of the public eye, evading accountability to American taxpayers. WS' killing practices, which cause immeasurable animal suffering, have gone unchecked even as incidents of extreme animal cruelty are brought to light.

Wild Things reveals the problems plaguing WS' lethal predator control operations and sheds light on the humane, nonlethal methods that many ranchers have adopted to enable them to both protect livestock and coexist with carnivores. Project Coyote's Camilla Fox and Science Advisory Board members Dr. Bob Crabtree and Becky Weed are all featured in this film sharing their perspectives on the value of humane, ecologically sound livestock protection practices and the need for reform within the WS program.

We look forward to seeing you!
